To those who are not, the following extract from a book lately published by a physician of South Carolina who spent three winters in Cuba, will be read with interest.]

"The coffee-tree merits a special notice. Passing from Ethiopia through Persia to Arabia, it reached the West Indies through Europe. Van Horn, in 1690, then governor of Batavia, having raised it in Java from seeds procured in Mocha, sent one plant to Nicholas Witsen, a burgomaster in Amsterdam, who placing it in the botanical garden of that city, other plants were to the West Indies. In 1718, coffee plantations were first made in Surinam, and at which time it was also introduced into Jamaica. When the French were driven from St. Domingo, they brought with them into Cuba the cultivation of this plant, and estates from that period multiplied rapidly on that island.
